A FISHY STORY

© 1963, BY WESTERN PUBLISHING COMPANY, INC.

A beautiful sailboat moved far out in the water beyond the pier where John Hardy and his Uncle Elmo were fishing. John watched the sails shift back and forth.

"That sloop is tacking to catch the wind," said John's uncle, "but even if the wind dies down, that size sloop carries a motor to chug its way back."

"But what if the skipper didn't have a motor?" asked John.

"Then he would be in the same trouble I was when I sailed in the International Yachting Race," replied Uncle Elmo.

John baited his hook, threw it in the water and settled back to enjoy the yarn. Uncle Elmo, it seemed, had been everywhere and had done everything. The things that happened to him were more exciting than those that happened to anyone else, even though they were sometimes hard to believe.

Uncle Elmo began his tale.

"When you saw the sails change direction, that sloop was trying to catch the wind. However, when the wind doesn't blow, sailors say they are becalmed, and that's exactly what happened to me one time. There I was halfway to Hawaii in a two-masted sloop, with one crewman, when the wind died. Luckily, I discovered fishpower."

"Fishpower?" asked John.

"Yep," said Uncle Elmo, "and to make matters worse, we were running out of food after being becalmed. I put my crewman at the tiller, and decided to fish for food. I baited my hook with a piece of bacon left over from breakfast and soon a bluefish took it."

"I thought you had to troll for bluefish, Uncle Elmo," interrupted John.

"Well, these bluefish were hungry and not fussy about rules," said Uncle Elmo.

"Right after the Blue bit, a sand shark went after the bait, and while we may have preferred the bluefish to eat, anything right then would have tasted good. So, I set myself to pull the shark in.

"Just when I was ready to gaff him, the water roiled and boiled; and the next thing I knew, the sloop was being pulled by fishpower. A great blue whale had meanwhile swallowed the sand shark and was going out to sea. This would have been fine, but he was going in the wrong direction.

"I fastened a harness out of fish line, and by tugging here and there like you guide a horse, I finally managed to make him go where we wanted to go. But, when we got near our course, he decided he wanted to dive . . . . and whales can dive 3000 feet deep."

"Yes, I know," nodded John.

"So, I whipped out my knife and cut the line. The wind had begun to blow again, so we sailed in under our own power and saved the cup for America."

"Just a minute," said John. "I have a bite." He hauled on the line, nearly falling in after it. He continued, "But I want to know what happened to the whale?"

"I think he must be on your line," said Uncle Elmo.

"I might believe that, but not your story," replied John. "In the first place, a whale is not a fish; it is a mammal. Secondly, sloops only have one mast." Soon holding up a flounder, he added, "And while I may not have caught a whale, at least I have a fish."

"Well, you'll agree, it was a good fishy story!" laughed Uncle Elmo.
